

How Your Electricity Needs Change In The Summer

You're thinking about the pool, or that upcoming vacation, or your next backyard barbeque.

Another thing to think about is how your electricity needs change vastly during the summer months. Most people don't give that a second thought, but it is important to be aware of your electric lifestyle and how changes in the season can affect your property.

Increased Electrical Usage - The kids are home, the pool pump is on, landscape lighting and outdoor lighting is in use, your air conditioner is working overtime; your overall electrical consumption levels have gone way up. In older homes, that could mean blowing fuses and tripping breakers. If you find that happening on a regular basis, it means it is time to call in a professional to diagnose the root of your service problems.

Outdoor Electrical Usage - Whether you're taking care of yard work or powering your party, make sure that whatever extension cords and surge protectors you are using outside are kept dry - and that they are specifically rated for outside use.

Rough Weather & Power Lines - Whether it is the line going to your house taken down by a tree limb or a main line going down in a storm, stay away from downed power lines. Assume that any cable you find down is live and dangerous, even if there are power outages in the area. Only qualified experts with the right safety equipment should be handling such issues.

By keeping these simple tips in mind, you'll be able to safely enjoy your summer!
